Missouri Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights

August 1999

A report of the Missouri Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights prepared for the information and consideration of the Commission. This report will be considered by the Commission and the Commission will make public its reaction.

The United States Commission on Civil Rights

The United States Commission on Civil Rights, first created by the Civil Rights Act of 1957, and reestablished by the United States Commission on Civil Rights Act of 1983, is an independent, bipartisan agency of the Federal Government. By the terms of the 1983 act, as amended by the Civil Rights Commission Amendments Act of 1994, the Commission is charged with the following duties pertaining to discrimination or denials of the equal protection of the laws based on race, color, religion, sex, age, disability, or national origin, or in the administration of justice: investigation of individual discriminatory denials of the right to vote; study and collection of information relating to discrimination or denials of the equal protection of the law; appraisal of the laws and policies of the United States with respect to discrimination or denials of equal protection of the law; maintenance of a national clearinghouse for information respecting discrimination or denials of equal protection of the law; investigation of patterns or practices of fraud of discrimination in the conduct of Federal elections; and preparation and issuance of public service announcements and advertising campaigns to discourage discrimination or denials of equal protection of the law. The Commission is also required to submit reports to the President and the Congress at such times as the Commission, the Congress, or the President shall deem desirable.

The State Advisory Committees

An Advisory Committee to the United States Commission on Civil Rights has been established in each of the 50 States and the District of Columbia pursuant to section 105 (c) of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 and section 3(d) of the Civil Rights Commission Amendments Act of 1994. The Advisory Committees are made up of responsible persons who serve without compensation. Their functions under their mandate from the Commission are to: advise the Commission of all relevant information concerning their respective States on matters within the jurisdiction of the Commission; advise the Commission on matters of mutual concern in the preparation of reports of the Commission to the President and the Congress; receive reports, suggestions and recommendations from individuals, public and private organizations, and public officials upon matters pertinent to inquiries conducted by the State Advisory Committee; initiate and forward advice and recommendations to the Commission upon matters in which the Commission shall request the assistance of the State Advisory Committee; and attend, as observers, any open hearing or conference that the Commission may hold within the State.

The Missouri Advisory Committee submits this report of its review of race relations in Springfield conducted during a community forum held on August 13, 1997. As part of its responsibilities to advise the Commission on civil rights issues in Missouri, the Advisory Committee invited Springfield residents, the mayor, the police chief, and the school district superintendent to provide their views on race relations.

The Advisory Committee, knowing that many taxpayers do not know where and how to file discrimination complaints, invited city, State, and Federal agencies to give presentations on how their complaint systems work for persons who have encountered discrimination.

The NAACP, Springfield branch, has monitored incidents of discrimination in the city as part of its mission. In recent years, the public discussion of the lynching of three innocent black men that occurred in 1906 has generated a call for a public apology for the lynching to the black community by city officials. This issue has hampered race relations in Springfield. Despite this serious, historical misdeed, the city's atmosphere is open to ideas for change.

The Springfield school district and the Springfield police department have indicated to the Advisory Committee their efforts to improve services to all students and residents. Springfield residents similarly have articulated their concern about equal treatment and services. The city residents have received new information on how to access government services for civil rights issues.

The majority and minority communities are beginning to know and to respect each other's different and distinct lifestyles. The Springfield community has the potential, the resources, and the leadership for making positive changes and taking a giant step forward into the 21st century in the area of race relations.

I. Introduction

Purpose and Background

The Missouri Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights has conducted race relations forums in Pemiscot County and in Jefferson City.¹ Experience from these Missouri meetings and previous State Advisory Committee projects in the region reveals that the average citizen has limited knowledge as to where or how to file a civil rights complaint. The average person does not know the extent of enforcement of civil rights laws that are entrusted to government agencies. However, there are some community advocates who help individuals exercise their rights by seeking justice in discriminatory incidents. Community advocacy groups such as the NAACP, LULAC, local independent living centers, the National Organization for Women, and American Indian centers are knowledgeable about the status of civil rights enforcement efforts and race relations in their respective communities.

The Missouri Advisory Committee, in its efforts to collect race relations data statewide and in response to monitoring concerns by Advisory Committee members, conducted a civil rights empowerment forum in Springfield on August 13, 1997. The purpose of the meeting was to receive information on "How to File a Discrimination Complaint" and on the status of race relations in Springfield from the perspectives of city, State, and Federal government officials as well as community advocates.²

Springfield has a population of 149,811 and is located in a Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area of 294,526 people in southwest Missouri.³ The Springfield minority population includes 3,197 blacks, 1,264 Asian Americans, 1,339 Hispanics, and 939 American Indians.⁴

A master's degree thesis, "Easter Offering: A Missouri Lynching, 1906," written by Mary N. Clary for the history department of Southwest Missouri State College provides a historical backdrop for race relations in Springfield. Its research describes the city of Springfield, its residents, and events leading up to a lynching incident on April 14, 1906.⁵

It started when police arrested two black men for a robbery, but the men were also accused of raping a white woman.⁶ On that Saturday night, of an Easter weekend, a group of Springfield residents broke into the city jail and took the two prisoners to the town square. The two were hung and burned without a trial to determine their guilt. But the mob was still not satisfied, so they went back to the jail and took a third black man and gave him a mock trial.⁷ They doused his body with coal oil, hung him by the neck, and pushed him into a fire. After the lynching racial tensions remained high in Springfield.⁸ Fear, terror, and intimidation caused several hundred black residents to leave the city of Springfield forever.⁹

In recent years, Springfield residents have talked about a public apology owed to the black community because of the 1906 lynching incident. White community leaders have not made a formal apology. This inability by public officials to issue a public apology has affected race relations in the city.¹⁰

Despite these circumstances, the NAACP, a local ministerial alliance, and other organizations continue to identify problems and work hard to find solutions in race relations.

II. Race Relations—A Community Perspective

As a part of its responsibility to monitor civil rights and race relations issues, the Missouri Advisory Committee visited Springfield, Missouri, in August 1997 to listen to its residents and government officials. Many views on race relations were offered during the Advisory Committee's forum.

Lee Gannaway, the mayor of Springfield, said the city is on target with minority hiring relative to their percentage in the labor market. However, the mayor admitted that despite concentrated efforts to recruit minorities for the police force, the city has not been successful. He indicated that perhaps the reason for the lack of minority police officers is due to the city's extremely high standards for the position and that those minority persons who qualify for the police force can make twice as much money in the private sector.¹

Mayor Gannaway discussed the city's race relations in the context of the Easter lynching of three black males in the town square, on April 14, 1906. The persons responsible for the lynching were tried but not convicted of the lynching. Ninety years later, the question of making a public apology to the black community for the lynching has become a concern. However, the mayor agrees with one community thought that says, "Let's look to the future with a positive attitude," as Springfield's way of looking at race relations in the city.²

Lesia Denney, the executive director of Responsible Education and Discipline (READ), an organization of parents residing in the Springfield School District, R-12, spoke to the Committee about several school incidents that surfaced in October 1996 when parents contacted her about problems in the neighborhood middle school. Some of the complaints were about student suspensions. The alleged lack of objectivity of the school district and the inability of parents to have their grievances recognized prompted community action.³

Ms. Denney gave personal examples of how her son and daughter were not given proper educational services in the administration of the student discipline policy. Her daughter was given an in-school suspension (ISS). This ISS period was held in a converted bathroom in the basement, which displayed nasty racial graffiti on the walls. Ms. Denney filed a sexual harassment grievance against the school district. This grievance was found unacceptable by the school district because it did not fall under the guidelines. Her grievance was invalid because it was filed with an outside agency.⁴ The READ group, which consists of approximately 40 persons, the majority of whom have experienced difficulty in communicating with school officials, will use the NAACP organization to help facilitate talks with the school district.

Rosemary Stewart-Stafford, a member of the NAACP, Springfield branch, gave the Committee her perspective on race relations based on her community activity experience. She used a collection of newspaper articles to support her comments. She recalled an activity in 1990, when the Ku Klux Klan (KKK) held a rally in a Springfield city park. Ms. Stewart-Stafford decided to hold an anti-KKK rally at the same time the KKK held its activity. Her purpose was to promote love and harmony in her town.⁵

Ms. Stewart-Stafford spoke about the community's efforts to get an apology for the 1906 lynchings in Springfield. She noted that Darrall Moore, a prosecuting attorney for the city of Springfield, said:

In my 12 years. . . I have seen the suspicions, distrust, and lack of confidence that many members of the black community have towards those of us in law enforcement, the prosecutor's office, and the court system. Does part of this distrust stem from the fact that several institutions failed to speak out to repudiate the vile act of 1906? I believe so. I believe that we cannot start working together to erase racism and other forms of discrimination until those of us currently occupying positions of power apologize to the black community for our biggest historical example of discrimination."⁶

Athel Ranson II, the president of the NAACP, Springfield branch, provided the Advisory Committee with information about the organization's relationship with the police department and other groups. The NAACP has filed discrimination complaints locally or with Federal officials when necessary. Mr. Ransom gave two examples, one of the mysterious, suspicious hanging death of a 19-year-old male person, living north of Springfield. He also mentioned a cross burning incident on the property of a mixed marriage couple living south of Springfield. He reported these two racial incidents to the U.S. Department of Justice, including the Community Relations Service.

Education

Arnold Greve, the superintendent of the Springfield R-12 School District, gave the Advisory Committee a profile of the district's operations. He said the district's student enrollment in the recent past has been 92 percent white; approximately 4 percent of students are African American, 2 percent Hispanic, 2 percent Asian, and less than 1 percent American Indian. There has been little change in the student statistics. The one exception is a growing Hispanic community, which has doubled from 1 to 2 percent (1994-1996). There are approximately 24,900 students in the Springfield schools.¹ The school district in 1996 made an effort to improve attendance. All student groups improved their attendance, with African American students showing the biggest gains.

According to Dr. Greve, the district's employment profile shows 1,856 certified staff and 1,067 noncertified staff for a total staff of 2,923 employees. The district employs 17 African American certified staff members, 2 Asians, 9 Hispanics, and 5 American Indians, for a total of 33 in the minority category.² The district's non-certified staff members numbers 1,067, of whom 1,037 are whites, 19 are African Americans, 2 are Asians, 3 Hispanics, and 4 American Indians, for a total of 28 minority persons or 3 percent of this category's total.³

The district implemented efforts to increase the number of minority certified staff 2 years ago. The school district started a minority scholarship program with three local institutions of higher learning. This involved students enrolled in teacher training programs. These students accept significant financial aid in exchange for the promise upon graduation to teach in the Springfield school district.⁴

The superintendent told the Committee about the school district's method of collecting student dropout data. The district counts each student only once. Dr. Greve said that during the past year (1996-97) this count dropped from 489 students to 429. Of the 429 dropouts, 383 were white, 34 African American, 8 Hispanic, 2 Asian, and 2 American Indian.⁵ Like most school districts, the Springfield district has an important objective in its academic plan to reduce the number of dropouts.⁶

Dr. Greve said August 1997 was the first time the district implemented mandatory sensitivity training for all staff members and administrators. The Respecting Ethnic and Cultural Heritage (REACH) training program has been available to the Springfield school district staff, but it was never mandatory. The superintendent also described an active, high profile school district multicultural committee and other activities designed to help improve race relations in the schools and in the community.⁷

With reference to student suspensions, Dr. Greve submitted that minority and biracial students are receiving a higher number of suspensions on a proportional basis across the district's schools. School officials are trying to evaluate the impact when there is a concentration of suspensions affecting minority students. On a case by case basis, suspensions are being evaluated against how school administrators interpret the district's revised discipline policies and the Missouri Safe School Act, both of which have been implemented in recent years and have affected student suspensions and dropout data.⁸

Dr. Greve spoke of the school district's outreach to minority group leaders, the NAACP, the African American Ministerial Coalition, and several highly visible multicultural activities that should enhance school-community relations.⁹ By his own admission, Dr. Greve mentioned the many good things happening in the district; however, the district has a long way to go before the minority student population achieves equal educational access.¹⁰

Administration of Justice

Hal Smith, a captain in the Springfield Police Department, represented the police chief, who was unable to attend the meeting. Captain Smith is one of four division commanders: He manages the Services Division, which has some responsibility for the recruitment and hiring of police officers, for internal affairs of the police department, and for the operations of the police academy.¹¹

Captain Smith informed the Advisory Committee that the city is not tremendously diverse in population and is primarily white. He said Springfield has a relatively low crime rate and when compared to 20 other cities in the midwest, it ranked eighth on the overall crime index and eleventh in violent crimes. In 1996 there were four homicides and the department solved all four cases. The city experienced about a 5 percent reduction in crime in 1996. The police department has 334 persons on staff, of whom 261 are sworn officers and 73 are civilian staff. Almost all of the staff is committed to front-end (direct) service delivery to the community, including programs to eliminate domestic violence and gangs in Springfield.¹²

Captain Smith said traditional recruiting of minorities for the department includes site visits to universities that have a high number of minority students. The police department also advertises its job vacancies in newspapers with minority group readership. The department provides job announcements to minority organizations. These methods have not yielded the results desired by the Springfield police department.¹³

After the police department evaluated its traditional recruitment methods, military installations and junior colleges in rural areas of Missouri and Arkansas were added to the list of sites visited for minority recruitment of sworn officer candidates. The police department also used the internship program as a recruitment strategy. Currently, of 11 interns, 7 are women and 2 are black persons. The objective of the program is to have the student interns return to work for the police department after receiving a college degree.¹⁴

Captain Smith explained how the department handles citizen complaints. The Springfield Police Department receives these complaints in various ways. These complaints include first party basis, second party basis, anonymously, by letter, by phone, and in person. Complaints are then divided into class 1, the most serious complaints, which are investigated by internal affairs; and class 2, minor complaints, which are generally handled by department supervisors. Timetables are used to manage and track complaints.

Class 1 complaint investigations are benchmarked for completion in 45 days. Persons responsible for complaint cases that are not investigated and completed in 45 days must explain, in a letter to the police chief, why the task was not completed. The chief will closely monitor this category of cases. Upon completion, class 1 complaints are forwarded to the Committee for Disciplinary Recommendations and are classified as sustained, not sustained, unfounded, exonerated, or policy failure.¹⁵ There have been approximately 65 complaints per year, per class.¹⁶

In a September 18, 1997, letter addressed to the Central Regional Office of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Robert Greer of the Springfield Police Department responded to a request for information made during the Advisory Committee forum with reference to the number of citizen complaints on file. Sergeant Greer reported that in 1995 there were 54 citizen complaints and in 1996, 58 complaints made against Springfield police officers. As of September 18, 1997, 38 citizen complaints had been filed for the year. Of the 58 complaints filed in 1996, 11 were sustained. In the same year the highest number (16) of complaints dealt with discourtesies. The type of complaint with the highest number sustained (5) dealt with lack of services. In addition, of the eight unnecessary, excessive use of force complaints, one was sustained. There were 172 use of force incidents in 1996.¹⁷

Captain Smith described the Springfield's police department's relationship with the minority communities as good. The police department generally contacts the NAACP whenever there is a racial concern affecting the Springfield black community. He described the working relationship with the NAACP as cordial, healthy, sometimes testy but always straightforward in terms of credibility. In recent times the Springfield community's concerns have been about cocaine and ethnic gangs. According to Captain Smith, the police department considers itself an asset to any discussion on race relations.¹⁸

IV. How to File A Discrimination Complaint

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights (USCCR) has compiled a document, Getting Uncle Sam to Enforce Your Civil Rights. It provides a list of Federal agencies and addresses along with a brief description of program responsibilities and civil rights laws these agencies must enforce.¹ The Missouri Advisory Committee through the Central Regional Office of the USCCR has distributed a regional directory with addresses and telephone numbers for more specific citizen complaints at the local level.²

The Missouri Advisory Committee also provided Springfield residents with technical assistance information from four Federal agencies, one State human rights agency, and one local human rights agency. Speaker presentations, complaint forms, instructions, and a directory of agency addresses were made available to participants at the community forum.

Federal Government

Four Federal agencies responsible for investigating and enforcing civil rights laws within their mandate and service jurisdiction made presentations to the Advisory Committee in Springfield, Missouri. These agencies included the U.S. Department of Education, Office for Civil Rights (OCR); the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), OCR; the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, Fair Housing Enforcement Center; and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC).³

On January 26, 1992, eight government departments including HHS began enforcing Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), which prohibits discrimination by State and local government entities on the basis of disability.⁴ According to John Halverson, director of HHS/OCR, Region VII:

Complaints are written allegations of discrimination based on the race, color, national origin, sex, age, creed, physical or mental disability and filed against recipients of Federal financial assistance, except in the area of Title II of ADA. Complaints of discrimination based on religion and sex can also be filed, but these are filed under certain of the block grant laws that OCR enforces.⁵

OCR provides technical assistance to ensure that beneficiaries and recipients of funding are aware of their civil rights compliance responsibilities. OCR has developed a strategic plan that will focus its limited resources in four specific areas: 1) access to health services and delivery of social services to minorities; 2) services to persons with limited English proficiency; 3) access and delivery of services to persons with HIV diseases; and 4) medical redlining. Medical redlining is the practice carried out by agencies such as home health providers who may choose not to provide services in certain minority neighborhoods. Generally, an agency's reasoning for not serving certain designated zones or areas is that it is dangerous for its staff to provide services there. Mr. Halverson stated that one cannot be denied benefits and services in program and activities funded by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services because of race, national origin, age, religion, color, sex, or handicap. A person who believes that he or she has been discriminated against by an entity receiving financial assistance from HSS may file a complaint with OCR. Complaints usually must be filed within 180 days from the date of the alleged discriminatory act. The complainant may request a discrimination complaint form from OCR, which should include the following:

Complaint Process Flow Chart

1. the complainant's name, address and phone number
2. name and address of the institution or agency you believe discriminated against you
3. how, why and when you believe you were discriminated against and
4. any other relevant information

Institutions or agencies noted above can be nursing homes, hospitals, medicaid providers, senior citizen centers, alcohol and drug treatment centers, etc. The complaint must be written and signed by the complainant or his or her representative.¹

The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission also provided complaint information. Carl Frick, the enforcement manager, and Robert Royal, trial attorney supervisor, both from the EEOC office in St. Louis, made presentations to the Missouri Advisory Committee. According to Mr. Frick, EEOC is charged with enforcing employment discrimination laws. EEOC has jurisdiction over four legislative acts, Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, the Americans with Disabilities Act, and the Equal Pay Act.²

For persons living in the Springfield area to file a complaint with EEOC in St. Louis, they have to call (314) 539-7800 and enter the voice mail system, which will require certain information. Persons may also call 1-800-669-7800. Then EEOC will send a charge inquiry form for the complainant to fill out and return to EEOC in St. Louis. The charge inquiry form information will go to an investigator. The investigator will contact the complainant within 21 days, to secure additional information and to draft a charge of discrimination that must be signed. Then EEOC will process the information as part of the investigation.³

EEOC's investigative process involves a reasonable cause standard. This standard cuts both ways. If EEOC finds a violation, it only needs to have a reasonable belief that a violation exists. EEOC also only needs a reasonable belief that a violation does not exist to stop processing the complaint.⁴ A current EEOC goal is to move the complaint process of the reasonable cause charges through the investigation in less than 270 days. An investigator picks up the charge, goes to the employer, obtain necessary information, reviews the information, and makes the quick decision. EEOC is also communicating this change in processing discrimination complaints to the community so that when the quick decision in a complaint is made, the individual and the community have a good understanding of the procedures that were followed in the investigation.⁵

EEOC is also using the alternate dispute resolution process. It allows parties to the complaint to have a neutral source to resolve the matter. The hope is that this method will move faster and persons who choose the alternate dispute resolution will be out of the system within 90 days with a satisfactory decision for both parties.

Robert Royal, the EEOC supervising trial attorney, described the legal aspect of the complaint process to the Advisory Committee. The St. Louis office has a legal unit with about 13 employees: a regional attorney, 2 supervisory trial attorneys, 5 trial attorneys, 4 paralegals, and 1 legal technician. A committee in the legal unit reviews the B charges (formal complaints) that might have some litigation potential. An "A" type charge is a complaint that is assigned to an attorney.⁶ The attorney is responsible for several tasks. The attorney makes sure the employer complies with the request for information. If the company does not comply, EEOC issues a subpoena for the information. If the subpoena does not produce the information requested, EEOC can go to a Federal court and have the judge enforce the administrative subpoena.⁷

After the information request is honored, EEOC attorneys confer with their investigators to evaluate the data and the strength of the case to see if more investigative work and evidence is needed. It is during this evaluation phase that the investigator and the case attorney recommend to the director that the complaint become a cause case.⁸ According to Mr. Royal, if the cause case fails conciliation, then it goes into litigation. The EEOC area office in St. Louis has authorization to file lawsuits locally for certain types of cases. Title VII lawsuits can be filed locally unless they are class action lawsuits that cost $100,000 or more to litigate. Class action lawsuits need approval from the Office of General Counsel (OGC) at Headquarters (Washington, D.C.). OGC reviews and coordinates all disability cases filed under the American with Disabilities Act. The EEOC area office in St. Louis has authority to process complaints and conduct litigation on employment discrimination cases. It has received a good mix of complaints from the four legislative acts within its mandate. Mr. Royal said that he had recollection of only two lawsuits in 10 years from the Springfield area.⁹

U.S. Department of Education, Office for Civil Rights

Whenever an individual or a group in the Springfield area experiences a discrimination incident in a school district and has not found satisfaction in their communications with school personnel, they can file a formal complaint to the U.S. Department of Education, Office for Civil Rights (OCR) in Kansas City, Missouri.

According to Angela Bennett, the OCR director, the agency has several tools available to process complaints: 1) the early complaint resolution; 2) agreements for corrective action; and 3) enforcement. OCR is a neutral party. It is not an advocate for the funding recipient or for the student. OCR is there to ensure equal access for both sides. The agency is concerned about completing an evaluation of the complaint within 30 days so that the complainant can know the status of the formal charge. OCR wants to know if it has jurisdiction under the Civil Rights Act and whether the complaints are filed in a timely manner and within 180 days of the alleged discriminatory act.¹⁰ Generally, the U.S. Department of Education follows procedures similar to other Federal or State agencies in processing formal complaints. If recipients of Federal funding do not comply with corrective actions, OCR can begin administrative enforcement proceedings to terminate assistance. But that is not

OCR's purpose. Its purpose is equal access and it strives to bring recipients into compliance with civil rights laws. The withdrawal of Federal funds is an option that is rarely pursued.¹¹

The Kansas City office of the U.S. Department of Education conducted one of its first Profile Assessment Resolution Reviews (PARR) in the Springfield school district. It was not a traditional compliance review that focused on determining compliance or noncompliance. The PARR review differs from the traditional review because it involves community participation. The review team interviewed school staff and students and also included the input of community organizations and individuals. The outcome of this approach was the identification of problems and a negotiated resolution agreement to meet the needs of the school and the community. The PARR review in Springfield looked at policies and procedures of the school district. The school district did not have solid policies and procedures in place. The PARR review team's findings dealt with establishing nondiscriminatory policies and procedures in the area of student discipline.¹²

Malcolm Barnett, equal opportunity specialist in the Kansas City Fair Housing Office, U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD), gave the Advisory Committee information on the Fair Housing Act complaint procedures. He said it is a violation of the act when a landlord treats potential renters differently because of their race, color, national origin, familial status, sex, or the fact that they have a disability. It is illegal to refuse to provide a reasonable accommodation for a person with a disability. It is also illegal to discriminate in the provision of either mortgage or home insurance. It is a violation of the Fair Housing Act to harass people who want to live in a neighborhood of their choice.¹³ Mr. Barnett said it was illegal for a municipality to use its zoning or code enforcement procedures to treat people differently because of their race, color, or because the property is to be used by persons with disabilities.¹⁴

Mr. Barnett described the complaint process by suggesting that if you are a victim of housing discrimination, the first step is to file a formal complaint with HUD or the Missouri Human Rights Commission. Additional information is generally collected from the proper parties involved to better understand the complaint. Once the intake unit determines that the agency has jurisdiction, the case is assigned to an investigator. That staff person will complete the investigation within 73 days of the time HUD first received the complaint. The investigator will have 50 days to do the investigation. At the 90-day benchmark, there will be a decision as to whether the case was a violation of the act or not. Within 100 days, HUD will have to notify the parties that there was cause or there was no cause violation. If there is a violation of the act, HUD will provide legal assistance to the complainant. Both parties can agree to go before a HUD administrative law judge or either party can elect to go to Federal district court. At the Federal district court level, the U.S. attorney will assign an attorney to represent HUD and the complainant before the Federal judge or jury if necessary. A HUD attorney will represent the complainant before an administrative law judge. If the administrative law judge or the Federal judge finds discrimination, civil penalties are assessed against the person or organization that discriminated. At the administrative law judge level, only actual damages are allowed. If the discrimination case is tried in Federal district court, punitive damages are possible.¹⁵

Mr. Barnett noted that HUD administers the housing section of the American with Disabilities Act, which provides that the same rights must be given to persons in both the public and private sector and also requires that public accommodations be accessible.¹⁶ As resources are available, the U.S. Departments of Housing and Urban Development, Health and Human Services, and Education and EEOC all provide technical assistance and outreach services to underserved populations in the community. Local human rights agencies generally have the name and addresses of State and Federal government contacts if technical assistance is needed by individuals or organizations.

State Government

Donna Cavitte, director of the compliance unit, told the Advisory Committee that the Missouri Human Rights Commission (MHRC) is the State agency that receives and investigates discrimination complaints in the area of employment, public accommodations, and housing. It employs approximately 48 persons and has four offices. The central office is in Jefferson City and field offices are in St. Louis, Kansas City, and Sikeston. MHRC functions the same as Federal government enforcement agencies in processing complaints, with some exceptions. The State can investigate Missouri employers with at least six full-time or part-time employees. EEOC jurisdiction requires a minimum of 15 employees before accepting a complaint for investigation.¹⁷

MHRC is exploring the possibility of adding mediation as a formal process to help both parties involved in a formal complaint. The State commission has a work-sharing relationship with EEOC and the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. Under this agreement, a person can file with the State agency and dually file with HUD if it is a housing discrimination complaint. This process creates a joint inventory and helps both agencies by coordinating complaint information.¹⁸

City Government

Kathy Clancy, the executive director of the Mayor's Commission on Human Rights and Community Relations in Springfield, gave the local government perspective on the discrimination complaint system. The mayor's commission is a two-person agency that provides technical assistance and intake service for residents of the city. It uses its 15-member board of volunteer commissioners to investigate complaints of discrimination, to make findings, and to mediate settlements. If this service does not prove suitable, the complainant has the option to file formally with the State human rights agency or the responsible Federal agency that has jurisdiction for that specific complaint.¹⁹

In 1996, 91 percent of the cases filed with the mayor's commission involved employment; 8 percent were housing and 2 percent were public accommodations complaints. Sexual harassment and disability cases declined and racial cases increased by 4 percent over the 1995 data.²⁰

Ms. Clancy said the city of Springfield has a lot of good programs and community efforts in place to improve race relations and to retain people of color who come to the city to live and work. She added that the attitude of all residents has to change in order to be more accepting of other cultures. The city has a long way to go, but Ms. Clancy believes that with cooperation, the goal of better race relations can be achieved.²¹

V. Summary

The Missouri Advisory Committee, in its continuing efforts to monitor the status of civil rights throughout the State, conducted a forum on race relations in Springfield, Missouri. The Committee, knowing many taxpayers do not know where or how to file a discrimination complaint, invited Federal, State, and city human rights agencies to give presentations on enforcement of civil rights laws. Springfield residents, a police department official, the school district's superintendent, and the mayor all provided views on race relations in the Springfield area.

If the historical aspect of race relations in Springfield is considered, progress has been made. However, parents in certain areas of the city have complained about the high rate of student suspensions and a lack of response to parents' complaints by school officials. Meanwhile, the superintendent spoke of efforts that have been made to correct areas of parental concern. Federal officials who enforce civil rights laws in the schools are aware of the Springfield situation because formal complaints have been filed by parents and the NAACP. OCR is conducting outreach services and is becoming more visible in the Springfield community. The police department is improving its recruitment strategies in order to attract minority and female candidates for employment. The police department is now recruiting at military bases and community colleges.

There were city residents that have praised the work of the police department and others who spoke to the Committee of the different standards used by the police in certain neighborhoods. Different standards were used by the police to monitor rallies held by the KKK and a group of citizens who opposed the KKK rally in a Springfield city park.

The Missouri Advisory Committee hopes the Civil Rights Empowerment Forum has provided information and resources that will be beneficial to the Springfield residents.

Government officials at the forum provided some good basic information on how their agencies function and on how the complaint system works within their agencies. All the government agencies that made presentations at the forum are involved in providing technical assistance and outreach services to underserved areas of the State. The ultimate objective of the forum was to bring information about the government's complaint systems closer to the taxpayer. The local NAACP branch has suggested and supported establishing of a citizen review board for police department complaints.

An additional objective was to describe the status of race relations in the city. The city of Springfield has a dark cloud hanging over it because of its history and recent discussions of the 1906 lynching on the town square. The city has the resources and the social systems in place to make positive changes that often are reflected in a vibrant community that has a quality school system and economic growth with quality jobs for its diverse work force. The Springfield community has the potential and the leadership to make positive changes and to take a giant step into the 21st century in the area of race relations.
